Personal Statement

Being an only child, I spent much of my time as a young girl entertaining myself. My creativity expanded rapidly because of this, and I found myself spending hours writing, making up games, and inventing. Then, one day, my mom brought home some old papers from her work. She gave them to me so I could draw and write on the blank sides, but I was much more intrigued by the charts on the opposite side. There were so many possibilities that suddenly came to mind: I could turn this into some sort of grading scale and pretend I was a teacher; I could make this an inventory chart and categorize and record the objects in my room; or even better, I could make up my own charts and manipulate them in any way necessary.

Looking back at these times allows me to realize what a long way I have come from the point I was at then. The combination of my education in creative writing, professional writing, science, math, web design, and my natural inclination toward organization and technology has led me to a professional writing career that not only fits my interests, but also helps me improve upon the skills and natural ability I have as a writer. The improvement in my writing from my childhood to high school, and then again from high school to college, was a great leap. By the time I graduated college, I felt confident enough in my writing abilities to start fine-tuning some of my previously created pieces and creating new types of documents as well. A memo that at one point in my education may have taken me an hour or two to write now only takes me ten or fifteen minutes.

Even education for my minors, German and psychology, have played an important role in my career, because they have taught me just how much language and the way we apply language can affect communication between people in the workplace, people outside the workplace, and even our interaction with different countries.

The most useful education I have received has been my job experience in the professional writing and technical writing fields. When I was able to finally apply what I had learned through my many classes at Purdue, I further sharpened my skills. I always enjoyed writing and dabbled in various types; however, I didn't realize how fun and rewarding it would be to make a career out of it.

I never grew up thinking, "I want to be a technical/professional writer someday," but it doesn't surprise me that I ended up where I am either. I have no regrets taking that path; it has always been a passion of mine, whether or not I knew the correct title for the career. If my experience and education have taught me anything, it's that the world cannot function without writers of all kinds. Having no professional writers would result in an extremely disorganized world; unknown, inaccurate, or "fuzzy" history; and poor communication. Having no creative writers would lead to a dull, monotonous society that ultimately never evolves. That said, I know what I can contribute truly benefits the world, and more importantly, every individual in it.
